

1 Highlights

- Understanding how agricultural intensification shapes pollinator health can improve conservation measures.
- Landscape simplification reduced bumble bee species richness and abundance of native but not introduced species.
- Abundance of an invasive bumble bee shaped community-wide parasite prevalence but landscape characteristics did not.
- Parasite species respond differently to ecological drivers; understanding why could improve our ability to predict pollinator disease outbreaks.